

AMERICANITY AS A CONCEPT, OR THE AMERICAS IN THE MODERN WORLD-SYSTEM

Anibal Quijano and Immanuel Wallerstein

I

The modern world-system was born in the long sixteenth century. The Americas as a geosocial construct were born in the long sixteenth century. The creation of this geosocial entity, the Americas, was the constitutive act of the modern world-system. The Americas were not incorporated into an already existing capitalist world-economy. There could not have been a capitalist world-economy without the Americas.

In Volume I of The Modern World-System (Wallerstein, New York: Academic Press, 1974, p. 38) it is argued that:

[T]hree things were essential to the establishment of . . . a capitalist world-economy: an expansion of the geographical size of the world in question, the development of variegated methods of labor control for different products and different zones of the world-economy, and the creation of relatively strong state machineries in what would become the core-states of this capitalist world-economy.

The Americas were essential to the first two of these three needs. They offered space, and they became the locus and prime testing-ground of 'variegated methods of labor control'. But, then one might say the same of East-Central Europe and of parts of Southern Europe. There was however one crucial difference between these areas and the Americas, which is why we can speak of Americanness as a concept. In those peripheral zones of the new capitalist world-economy that were located on the continent of Europe (for example, in Poland or in Sicily) the strength of the existing agricultural communities and of their indigenous nobilities was considerable. Therefore, faced with the reconstruction of their economic and political institutions which occurred in the process of peripheralization, they were able to locate their cultural resistance to exploitation in their historicity, a locus that has served them right up to the twentieth century.

In the Americas, however, there was such widespread destruction of the indigenous populations, especially among hunting and gathering populations, and such widespread importation of a labour force, that the process of peripheralization involved less the reconstruction of economic and political institutions than their construction, virtually ex nihilo everywhere (except perhaps in the Mexican and Andean zones). Hence, from the beginning, the mode of cultural resistance to oppressive conditions was less in the claims of historicity than in the fight forward to 'modernity'. Americanness has always been, and remains to this day, an essential element in what we mean by 'modernity'. The Americas were the 'New World', a badge and a burden assumed from the outset. But as the centuries went by, the New World became the pattern, the model of the entire world-system.

What was this 'newness'? The newness were four-fold, each linked to the other: coloniality, ethnicity, racism, and the concept of newness itself.

Coloniality was an essential element in the integration of the interstate system, creating not only rank order but sets of rules for the interactions of states with each other. Thus it was that the very efforts of those at the bottom of the rank order to overcome their low ranking served in many ways to secure the ranks further. The administrative boundaries established by the colonial authorities had had a certain fluidity in that, from the perspective of the metropole, the essential boundary-line was that of the empire vis-à- of North America and Latin America, beginning in the eighteenth century. shift their place in the ranking. The exemplary instance was the divergence of the paths become the first testing-ground too of the possibility for a few, never more than a few, to was always possible for a few states to shift ranks in the hierarchy. The Americas would and not least of all of all cultural. The hierarchy reproduced itself over time, although it The hierarchy of coloniality manifested itself in all domains - political, economic, the Americas were formal colonies, subordinated politically to a few European states. were new. And for the first three centuries of the modern world-system, all the states in modern political systems; quite often they did not. In the Americas, all the boundaries ways. Sometimes the boundaries showed some kind of historical continuity with pre- constantly changed over the centuries, sometimes in major ways, almost always in small from those at the top to those at the very bottom. The boundaries of these states have important to understand that all the states in this interstate system were new creations— continues in the form of a socio-cultural hierarchy of European and non-European. It is colonies. But even when formal colonial status would end, coloniality would not. It interstate system in hierarchical layers. Those at the very bottom were the formal Coloniality was essentially the creation of a set of states linked together within an moment was as complex or as simplified as the local situation required. In loci and variation in the usages in the Americas. The categorization within each state at any given history can be seen by simply looking at the state-by-state and century-by-century That none of these categories is anchored either in genetics or in ancient cultural

They have become the cultural staple of the entire world-system. not exist prior to the modern world-system. They are part of what make up Americanness. Mestizos or other names given to a so-called 'mixed' category) - all these categories did (Native Americans or 'Indians', Blacks or 'Negros', Whites or 'Creoles'/Europeans, categories, however, into which we ethnically divide today in the Americas and the world Ethnicities are always contemporary constructs, and thus always changing. All the major state. Ethnic groups claim their history, but they first of all create their history. part we impose upon ourselves, serving to locate our identity and our rank within the Ethnicity is the set of communal boundaries into which in part we are put by others, in made it possible for ethnicity to emerge as a building block of the modern world-system. It was the stateness of the states, and first of all of the states in the Americas that coloniality; it merely transformed its outer form. flourish. They confirmed the states in their hierarchy. Independence did not undo states as the realm within which the communal sentiment of nationalism could breed and state, the United States of America. The independences crystallized the stateness of these British Crown Colonies fought together a war of independence and came to form a new of independence to yield, more or less, the states we know today. Thirteen of over 30 decolonized states. The Spanish viceroalties were carved up in the process of the wars vis other metropolitan empires. It was decolonization that fixed the stateness of the Evolution of the modern world-system brought about both the ending of formal colonial Ethnicity therefore was not enough to maintain the new structures. As the historical ethnic hierarchy, as in the Tupac Amaru rebellion.

 Black ex-slave republics as in Haiti or rural Native American claims to upsetting the more clearly the movements of the White settler population, frightened by the spectres of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, as the various movements became ever Native American revolts. It coloured too the whole movement of the independences in oppressions). Political upheaval took on ethnic colouration in the multiple slave and how to adapt and thereby cope) and radicalizing (learning the nature and the source of the associated with ethnic identities. This was simultaneously politically calming (learning reinforced from below. Families socialized their children into the cultural forms Ethnicity served not only as a categorization imposed from above, but as one ethnic categories were updated. But an ethnic hierarchy remained.

 into the post-independence period, the forms of labour control and the names of the were the early forms of ethnic allocation to position in the work hierarchy. As we came Americans, indentured labour (engaged) for the European working class. These of course various forms of coerced cash-crop labour (repartimiento, mita, peonage) for Native forms of labour control, invented as part of Americanity: slavery for the Black Africans, social boundaries corresponding to the division of labour. And it justified the multiple Ethnicity was the inevitable cultural consequence of coloniality. It delineated the different groups into a more elaborate division of labour.

number. In loci and moments of economic expansion, the categories often expanded to fit moments of acute social conflict, the ethnic categories utilized were often reduced in rule (first of all in the Americas) and the abolition of slavery (primarily a phenomenon of the Americas), ethnicity had to be reinforced by a conscious and systematic racism. Of course, racism was always implicit in ethnicity, and racist attitudes were part and parcel of Americanism and modernity from the outset. But full-fledged racism, theorized and explicit, was a creation largely of the nineteenth century, as a means of shoring up culturally an economic hierarchy some of whose political guarantees were weakening in the post-1789 era of 'popular sovereignty'.

The underlying reality of racism does not always require the verbal or even the surface social acting out of racist behaviour. In the more peripheral zones of the capitalist world-economy, for example in Latin America in nineteenth and twentieth centuries, racism could hide behind the petticoats of ethnic hierarchy. Formal segregation or even lesser formal discriminations were not practiced. The existence of racism in such countries as Brazil or Peru is usually staunchly denied.

The nineteenth-century United States, on the other hand, after the formal ending of slavery, was the first state in the modern system to enact formal segregation, as well as the first country to park Native Americans in reserves. It seemed to be precisely because of its strong position in the world-economy that the United States needed such legislation. In a country in which the size of the upper strata was growing much larger as a percentage of national population, and in which consequently there was so much individual upward mobility, the more informal constraints of ethnicity seemed to be insufficient to maintain the workplace and social hierarchies. Thus formal racism became a further contribution of Americanism to the world-system.

The post-1945 ascension of the United States to hegemony in the world-system made

It was the independence of the Americas which represented the political realization of newness that was deemed to be better. From then on, as North America diverged from Latin America, its advantage was ascribed by most persons to the fact that it better

This brings us then to the fourth contribution of Americanity, the deification and reification of newness, itself a derivative of the faith in science which is a pillar of modernity. The New World was new, that is not old, not tied down to tradition, to a feudal past, to privilege, to antiquated ways of doing things. Whatever was 'new' and more 'modern' was better. But more than that, everything was always defined as being new. Since the value of historic depth was denied morally, its use as an analytical tool was dismissed as well.

Ethnicity still needed to be buoyed up by racism, but racism now had to take on a subtler face. Racism took refuge in its seeming opposite, universalism and the derived concept of meritocracy. It is in the debates of the last 20 years that we find this latest contribution of Americanity. Given an ethnic hierarchy, an examination system inevitably favours disproportionately upper ethnic strata. The extra added plus is that a meritocratic system justifies racist attitudes without the need to verbalize them. Those ethnic strata who perform more poorly do so because they are racially inferior. The evidence seems to be statistical, hence 'scientific'.

Third World within' was born, once again a contribution of Americanity to the world-legal and illegal migration from non-European countries such that the concept of the other hand, the very same hegemony made it necessary for the US to permit widespread it ideologically untenable for the United States to maintain formal segregation. On the Historically separated during the colonial period, the Americas have developed direct relations only since the nineteenth century, eventually coming to constitute a specific part of the world-system in a structure in which the United States was the hegemonic power.

II

America.

that anti-racist political mobilization received its earliest and greatest impulse in North intellectual scene by the Economic Commission from Latin America. It was no accident Americas. It was no accident that core-periphery analysis was propelled onto the world centuries, Americanness has exposed itself to critical regard, and first of all in the circuitous consequences have led to so much politico-intellectual turmoil over four contradiction. Because Americanness has existed longest in the Americas, because its tem, and it invented all this out of the American crucible. Yet Americanness was its own world-system. It established a series of institutions and worldviews that sustained the sys-

Thus, Americanness was the erection of a gigantic ideological overlay to the modern their inevitability into the collective superego of the world-system.

out of the inequalities of the present, the concept of 'newness' encrusted them and inserted and stabilization of the capitalist world-economy. Under the appearance of offering a way the fourth and perhaps more efficacious contribution of Americanness to the development attention from the development of underdevelopment. The concept of 'newness' was thus economic success, but also its proof. It was a perfectly circular argument, which diverted incarnated 'newness', that it was more 'modern'. Modernity became the justification of

This derives from the well-known differences in the Native American societies in the two zones. But it was more than this fact alone, as is quite evident from the realization that the British called the Native American societies 'nations'. To be sure they were subordinate ones, but as nations outside the various societies constituted by the British, they were seen as providers of furs and other raw materials as well as allies in historical processes would therefore be very different. whereas the Iberian colonies were societies of European and Native Americans. The colonies constituted themselves initially as European-societies-outside-of-Europe, meant almost exclusively subordination to the British Crown. This meant that the British Europeans over Indians. In the British-American zone, on the other hand, coloniality subordination to the Crown in the metropole, but above all in the domination of start with, coloniality in the Ibero-American zone, did not consist only in the political constituted and in its processes, in the context of each successive historical moment. To fundamental explanation is to be located in the differences in the way power was How do we explain such different trajectories in the history of the Americas? The worldwide power of history. nineteenth century, its power has continually grown until it became the first truly was defeated. The North, the United States, won its independence, and since the project with real decolonizing potential, that of Tupac Amaru in the vicerealty of Peru, By the end of the century, the South was peripheralized, and the first independence and dense. However, this situation became inverted around the mid-eighteenth century. products were most varied and richest and whose society and culture most deeply rooted From the late fifteenth to the eighteenth centuries, it was the Iberian colonies whose

When Spain first came into contact with America, she had just completed the Reconquista and was only beginning the process of creating a strong central state. The establishment of a colonial empire under these conditions had particular consequences for Iberian society. During the sixteenth century, the Crown continued the centralization of the state with a seigniorial model of power, while destroying the autonomy, the democracy, and the production of the bourgeoisie in order to subordinate them to the rule colonization and its implications for the respective metropolises and colonial societies. new historical process was already fully underway. Consequently, the colonizing British to the northern parts of America more than a century later took place when this beginnings of the world market, of capitalism, and of modernity. The arrival of the and baptism of America by the Iberians at the end of the fifteenth century occurred at the factors in colonial history. Let us remember, first of all, that the conquest, colonization, We must therefore turn our attention to the colonizing societies to locate other the basis of their domination. position of exploitation and subordination, and the colonial societies were constructed on power. As for the survivors, on the slagheap of these societies, they were placed in a first decades almost exterminated them. Above all, they used them as discardable labour destroying highly advanced Native American societies. They enslaved them, and in the really human and had 'souls', while they were precisely in the process of conquering and The Iberians, on the contrary, had heated debates as to whether the 'Indians' were exterminate rather than to colonize the Native Americans. wars against other Europeans. After independence, the North Americans preferred to Iberian conquistador carried with him in his mind concepts of power and social values. The implications of all this for the shape of colonial society were decisive. The England, and Iberian societies entered into a long phase of peripheralization. As a result, in the seventeenth century Spain lost the European struggle with European bankers and to British, French, Dutch, and Flemish industrialists and colonial wealth. But as local production stagnated, this wealth was transferred to central prestige than for commercial profits. The enormous expenses incurred were supported by Furthermore, the Crown sought to expand its European power for reasons of dynastic which permitted the replacement of local production and the local producing classes. immense metallic wealth and the virtually inexhaustible free labour of colonial America All this would not perhaps have been possible without the acquisition of the reason it is windmills he attacks and knocks down.

Don Quixote believes he sees giants and gets ready to assail them, but for no apparent This situation has been captured in the greatest historical image of European literature— classes coexisted but were incompatible with the formal values of the Iberian seigniors. The consequence was that the social practices of the merchant and entrepreneurial of the seventeenth century. was blocked in the Peninsula, a blockage that was aggravated during the European crisis subjective practices of mercantilism. But the transition from merchant to industrial capital did not keep colonial wealth from stimulating the diffusion of the materialist and and Mudyjar cultivators and artisans, as well as of Jewish merchants and financiers. This dominated by the Inquisition. Religious ideology legitimated the expulsion of Mozarabite of the noble courtiers. The Church incarnated the Counter-Reformation and was that were seigniorial, despite the fact that his acts and motives in the conquest were commercial in origin. Thus, in the first period of organizing colonial power, behind the 'Indian encomienda' and the encomendero we can discern the shadow of the feudal lord. But in the dismantling of the encomienda system, soon thereafter, and in the imposition of a political-bureaucratic centralization of the colonies under the authority of the Crown, we see the impact of commercial necessities.

The political order was centralized and bureaucratic, and in that sense not feudal. But at the same time it was seigniorial, arbitrary, patrimonial, and formalist. The structure of production was geared to the external market and was imperfect for the internal market (not being the same as internal consumption, which was to be sure very great, especially that of the seigniors and the ecclesiastics, but which for the most did not go through the market). Seigniorial privileges were exercised particularly in relation to 'Indians' and 'Negros' with all the attached sociopsychological implications (disdain for labour, especially manual labour; concern with social prestige, 'honour', and its correlates; obsession with appearances, intrigue, gossip, discrimination).

The arrival of the Bourbon dynasty in the eighteenth century was not helpful to the colonies. The new geography of Spanish colonial administration served in practice the interests of English Atlantic trade. It disarticulated the structure of production, bled the rich areas financially to pay for the Crown's wars, and limited manufacturing in favour of imports from European industry. It thereby led to the peripheralization of previously productive regions. There is little doubt that it laid the basis for subsequent 'balkanization' of the former colonies in the nineteenth century.

In contrast, when the first British settlers disembarked in North America, in the

Even the slave structures were being operated as part of the system of capitalism. It is true they permitted seigniorial social relations but these were constrained by the need to treat everything as commodities (even the slaves) to produce goods from which to obtain profits. These structures did not oppose but rather stimulated the technological innovations that were part of the industrial revolution, quite the opposite of Iberian Bourbons.

British-American colonial society was not the result of conquering or destroying Native American societies. It was organized as a society of Europeans on American soil. Above all, it represented the exceptional case of a society which shaped itself, from the outset, as a capitalist society without those groups and social interests, institutions, norms and symbols which corresponded in Britain to feudal history, as well as with quite abundant natural resources. Production was primarily for the internal, not the external market. It was articulated to the metropole not only as the provider of new materials but as part of the process of industrial production. The state regulated and established the norms, but did not control, nor was it the owner of the resources, nor of the productive enterprises, as in the Iberian case. In British America no Church was all-powerful, no Inquisition held off modernity and rationality, as in the case of Ibero-America before the beginning of the seventeenth century, all the social and intersubjective tendencies of capitalist transition were in place and led to the first specifically bourgeois political revolution in Europe (Cromwell) as well as to the first properly speaking political-philosophical debate of European modern history, the product of a marriage of power and intelligence. From the end of the sixteenth century, England's domination of the seas and

of the world market were in full expansion.

The two Americas began the nineteenth century in very unequal conditions and pursued quite distinct paths. The United States followed a pattern of development, of the new and unusual. It constituted itself as a nation at the same time as it was developing an independence had the sense of a revolution, the American revolution. modernity and rationality. It is therefore not at all surprising that North American development and those of the political debate organized around the new bases of relations with state institutions. Independence combined the needs of national capitalist a strong state, but also with a civil society having the mechanisms to regulate its States of America, with a political regime based on a clear hegemonic social order, with On the other hand, the former British-American colonies established the United was special. But its independence movement occurred later. Ibero-American zone, or of establishing and sustaining local states. The case of Brazil capable either of articulating or directing coalitions to preserve political unity in the colonialism came to an end, there were no hegemonic social forces in the former colonies at the beginning of the nineteenth century. It was far from a revolution. When Iberian dominant seigniors decided they wished to get out from under the liberal regime of Spain control. In fact, in the principal colonial centres, independence only occurred when the an 'Indian' anticolonial movement or to the needs of capitalist expansion and its rational Amaru movement in 1780, the independent revolts corresponded only very partially to economies, with their social and political patterns in crisis. With the defeat of the Tupac zones. The Ibero-American colonies at the end of the eighteenth century had stagnating The independence movements had distinct logics and consequences in the two structures based on free 'Indian' labour power, which was not commercially produced.

imperial role as a hegemonic power. Thus, 'manifest destiny' was a quite appropriate ideological slogan.

This pattern has successive historical stages and modalities: (1) the violent territorial expansion that permitted the US to double its area in less than 80 years, absorbing the 'Indian' territories in the West plus half of Mexico; (2) the imposition of a quasi-protectorate over the countries of the Caribbean and Central America, including the 'rape' of Panama and the building and control of the Panama Canal, as well as of the Philippines and Guam; (3) the imposing of economic and political hegemony over the rest of Latin America following the First World War; (4) the imposition of world hegemony after the Second World War, which integrated the US in a world power structure.

Two decisive factors must be noted in this regard. One is the rapid capitalist development of the US, which already at the end of the nineteenth century was able to compete with Europe and especially with the UK. The second is the hegemonic association with the UK in the inter-war period in relation to both Europe and Latin America, an association that would in the end bring British support to US world hegemony.

During this same period, Latin America 'balkanized' itself. There were bloody frontier wars and civil wars all over. Power was organized on seigniorial-mercantile bases. The development of capitalism and its correlative social bases stagnated. Modern thought, under these conditions, suffered the Kafkaesque torture of internal exile or utopian flight. The dominant classes, Euro-centric, adopted the European mystifying model of the nation-state for societies whose foundations remained the colonial

First, there is a trend to a more systematic articulation of the Americas under the
 In the future perspective of the Americas, certain processes should be underlined.

is affected by the gravest crisis of its post-colonial history.
 order in which the US still occupies top place and Latin America a subordinate place, and they will not begin it separately or follow separate paths, but as part of a single world inequalities as those with which they began the nineteenth. With one difference however:
 The Americas are preparing to begin the twenty-first century with virtually the same socialist-nationalism, whose components are juggled differently in each country.

III

 peculiar and specifically Latin American political creature, populist-developmentalunresolved crisis of power, whose most exact expression is the persistence of that revolution in the other countries not only failed to resolve the problem but created an seemed to begin with the Mexican revolution. But the defeat of the national-democratic treated not simultaneously but successively. The disentanglement or cutting of this nexus identity, and democracy - questions and problems that elsewhere, in Europe, had been imprisoned in the historical nexus formed by the imbrication of the issues of nation, During the twentieth century, Latin America remained for the most part development and its subordination first to European then to North American imperialism.
 thing ensured the persistence of the dependent character of the pattern of its historical political system for societies that were dominated by mercantile-signiorial strata. Everystratification between the European and non-European, and the liberal model of a hegemony of North America (including now Canada, in a secondary way). This includes the growing migratory flux from south to north and especially to the US. Secondly, there is a greater internal articulation within Latin America, despite the contrary pressures of global capital, Europe, Japan, the US. Thirdly, there is a growing decolonization of the production of culture, of the arts, and of scientific knowledge. In short, the Americanization of the Americas is coming into full bloom.

The Americas are the historical product of European colonial domination. But they were never merely an extension of Europe, not even in the British-American zone. They are an original creation, which have taken long to mature and to abandon their dependent posture vis-à-vis Europe, especially in Latin America. But today, if one listens to the sounds, the images, the symbols, and the utopias of the Americas, one must acknowledge the maturation of an autonomous social pattern, the presence of a process of reinvention of culture in the Americas. This is what we are calling the Americanization of the Americas, which is sustained by the crisis of the European pattern.

The creation of the US as a directly capitalist society was the basis there of a utopia of social equality and individual liberty. These images veiled of course very real social hierarchies and their articulation with power. But they also hindered their legitimation, maintained the space for debate, and offered society the possibility to regulate the power of the state. In Latin America, the persistence of a Native American imagery under conditions of domination was the basis of a utopia of reciprocity, of social solidarity and of direct democracy. And in the present crisis, some of the oppressed have been organizing themselves in this way within the general framework of the capitalist market.

Sooner or later, these American utopias will be joined together to create and offer to the world a specifically all-American utopia. The movement of peoples and culture among the Americas and their gradual integration into a single power framework is or may become one of its most efficacious underpinnings.